

Are LUSH solid shampoo bars plastic-free?

LUSH's solid shampoo bars are entirely plastic-free. They come with no packaging and last longer than most liquid shampoos, which require more energy and water to create. These eco-friendly shampoo bars were invented by Lush co-founder Mo Constantine and cosmetic chemist Stan Krysztal.

What are LUSH's zero-waste shampoo bars?

LUSH's zero-waste shampoo bars are a great alternative to liquid shampoos. They require less energy and water to create and are entirely plastic-free. Additionally, they are self-preserving and contain no synthetic preservatives, making them a perfect travel companion.

What size lush shampoo bars do you use?

The "medium" size is a perfect fit for standard-size LUSH shampoo bars like Godiva, and Seanik, and I'm able to force the conditioner bars in there as well with a bit of determination. I also use these for bobby pins, hair ties, pills, and other small items in my travel bag.

How long does a LUSH shampoo bar last?

1 shampoo bar can last up to 60 washes. We invented it in 1987 to help you build a zero-waste, plastic-free hair care routine.

Are there alternatives to lush solid conditioner bars?

As with the solid shampoo, there are alternatives to Lush solid conditioner bars, and the ones I've tried (like this gorgeous-smelling hand-made lavender and lime solid conditioner) seem to work pretty much the same. None have come close to replicating the results from standard bottled conditioner, which is rather frustrating.

Can I buy metal tins for lush solid shampoo?

You can buy metal tins for the Lush solid shampoos, but they don't make any the right size or shape for the conditioners, which seems to be a bit of an oversight. It's also really difficult to remove the used shampoo out of the tins once it's wet, since the tins are not flexible, and to be honest I found them a bit of a nightmare.
